USDA/WASDE Reports Could Be a Tale of Two Markets

The election is past us so traders and producers can now focus, once again, on the fundamentals in the grain markets. This week's crop progress report showed corn and soybeans both nearly complete on their respective harvests. Winter wheat is a bit of a concern as the conditions ratings fell to just 39% on the good-to-excellent ratings, which is one of the lowest reported ratings this early in the crop year. The trade today was driven by fundamentals as it will be tomorrow.

On the demand side of the balance sheet export sales, in general, were weak. Soybeans were the biggest disappointment, but still are well ahead of pace, factoring in seasonality, to meet current USDA projections for the marketing year. Corn on the other hand is slightly behind pace to meet current expectations by the USDA. For soybeans, revisions higher by about 20 million bushels to export demand are expected in tomorrow's report according to the average analysts' guess. The Reuter's poll of analysts showed estimated export demand to fall by about 38 million bushels. The general consensus of analysts is for crush usage to be higher for soybeans, while ethanol usage to be lower for corn. Supply side fundamentals will move the market, also.

Soybean production is estimated to get a slight bump up as an increase in yield and harvested acres is expected. Corn, on the other hand, could see harvested acres move lower. Analysts are expecting yield to be roughly unchanged in tomorrow's report. Another area of concern will be world wheat production as we've seen revisions made lower to the Black Sea region, Argentina, and Australian wheat crops. These areas are major exporters of wheat and the fall out could be higher demand of USA produced wheat. We'll have to wait for subsequent reports to see these changes. After these changes to the balance sheet, the end result is an estimated increase in corn ending stocks for '12/'13 and roughly unchanged soybean ending stocks.

Technically speaking, the daily December corn chart continues to be range bound and bumped up against resistance from the 100 day moving average and the psychological resistance level of $7.50. January soybeans tested and fell through the $15.00 support level, but this move was on relatively low volume. December wheat is testing the upper end of its range near the $9.00 level. These will be key levels to pay attention to leading up to and during tomorrow's reports, which could be the catalyst to move the markets past these key technical areas.
